Oysters for Tuberculosis,

London, Nov. 2.-Oysters are recommended as a tonic for tuberculosis patients by no less an authority than the Lancet. It has been known that the drinking of a small quantity of sea water before meals is of great benefit to sufferers from the white plague, but to most of them it is distasteful. This difficulty, the Lancet points out, may be overcome by the use of oysters, and M. J. Charles and M. B. Laquet strongly recommend it. Six large oysters, fresh or previously impregnated with sea water, contain in their shells from fifty-five to sixty grams of this liquid. This amount closely approximates that usually prescribed. The clinical results thus obtained have been most satisfactory and quite comparable to those followings the simple ingestion of sea water.

LIFE-SAVERS ARE POWERLESS

Norfolk, Va., Nov. 2-Lashed to the crosstrees of the one remaining mast, with the hulk going to pieces under him, the sole survivor of the eight men aboard the three-masted schooner John Maxwell was late to-night calmly facing an awful leath as the raging waves pounded the stranded vessel.

Two steamers were standing close by the doomed schooner, and the life-savers from the New Inlet Station watched from the shore, all powerless to give the least assistance. The waves were rolling mountain high over the veisel, and a forty-mile gale tore the few remaining forty-mile sale tore the few remaining sails into ribbons.

The schooner, driven out of her course by the heavy north wind, went ashore last night three-quarters of a mile southeast of the New Inlet Life-saving Station, thirty-five miles north of Cape Hatteras. The schooner was bound from Norfolk to Savannah with a cargo of coal, and was under the command of Capt. Godfrey. The crew numbered seven.

When sighted by the life-savers this morning the schooner was hard aground on the shoals about a half mile off shore and was breaking up fast, two of the masts already having gone. Two men were clinging to the rigging, and as they saw the life-savers begin the work of launching the surf boat they waved their hats. The six other men evidently had perished.

Tries to Swim Ashore. The sea, breaking high and with canon-like roars on the beach, drove the surf men back, filling their boat with water and smothering the men them-selves under a mass of foam. Two life-savers sustained injuries. Five times the savers sustained injuries. Five times the men tried, each effort turning to naught by the ocean. Two attempts to shoot a line across the wreck fatled, as the chilled and exhausted men in the rigging were unable to make it fast.

Despairing of being saved, one of the men cast off his lashings and dived into the sea in an effort to swim ashore. For a short while he was able to keep his head out of the water as he atruggled to reach the beach. A floating piece of timber was seen to strike his head and he went down for the last time.
